When a cartel gunman is killed, he leaves behind Sujo, his beloved 4-year-old son. the shadow of violence surrounds Sujo during each stage of his life in the isolated Mexican countryside. As he grows into a man, Sujo finds that fulfilling his father's destiny may be inescapable.

SYNOPSIS

After a cartel gunman from a small Mexican town is murdered, Sujo, his beloved four-year-old son, is left an orphan and in danger. Sujo narrowly escapes death with the help of his aunt who raises him in the isolated countryside amidst hardship, poverty, and the constant peril associated with his identity. When he enters his teens a rebelliousness awakens in him, and like a rite of passage, he joins the local cartel. As a young man, Sujo attempts to make his life anew, away from the violence of his hometown. however, when his father's legacy catches up with him, he will come face-to-face with what seems to be his destiny.

DIRECTORS' NOTE

We are Astrid Rondero and Fernanda Valadez and we are writers, directors, and producers from Mexico. Sujo is our second feature as directors and our third creative collaboration on a feature film. We believe the strength of our films comes from us being part of a minority and that we are committed to telling the stories of our time. And what a time it is in Mexico. Thousands of kids have become orphans due to the violence of the drug cartels. Some of them are children of the victims, "the collateral damage" of the drug war. But others are the sons and daughters of the people who actively participated as perpetrators. This is a story about these "others." We wondered - what is the inheritance of these kids, what awaits them? and then came the question that shaped this story - what would it take for a young man to challenge what appears to be his destiny?

Sujo became the tale of two origins: that of a name and that of a man. In the tale of a cartel gunman naming his son after a horse, we aim to talk about transcendence, about hidden inheritances, about the dreams we fulfill without us knowing: dreams in the minds of our mothers and fathers, and their mothers and fathers before them. A flow of human experience that connects us all and is not oblivious to the hopes of previous generations.

Formally, Sujo is a coming-of-age story told through the many characters that meant something in Sujo's life: the people who loved him, taught him, and left behind as he grew up. It is an episodic film. And that's one of the aspects that excited us the most as directors: our goal in this film was to explore narratively, formally, and visually. Sujo has a visual narrative that changes as the episodes change as if every secondary character were a season in Sujo's life. We wanted each episode to have its atmosphere. And as we were exploring texture, light, and mood, we decided to shoot each episode with a different set of lenses that were key in that exploration.

The film has different levels of reality. Not in a flashy or stylized way, because we were looking for something more ancient and primal. Like beliefs and imagery that come from the first women and men, elements as magical as they are mysterious and real, like the fire, like a starry night, like death. So we want the episodes to be like the faces of a prism, each one adding a piece and a layer of a more complex object. In the end, the whole film is a portrait of this young man, Sujo. A portrait but also a promise of the man he deserves to be.

A young man in a dark hoodie is shown in profile, looking upwards and to the right. He is standing in a dimly lit street at night, with blurred lights and buildings in the background. The overall mood is contemplative and somber.

THE INSPIRATION BEHIND THE FILM

When we were working on our previous film Identifying Features, we came across a particular book of chronicles called Levantones (the taken) written by the great Mexican journalist Javier Valdez, himself later a victim of violence. It wasn't a special story that caught our attention but more an atmosphere that he managed to share with deep humanity and utmost respect: real accounts of both victims and perpetrators, women, men and children, all caught for one reason or the other in the drug cartel violence that runs rampant in Mexico.

Deep within, there is also the inspiration of Jude the Obscure by Thomas Hardy, which is one of Astrid's most beloved books. The stories of orphans in turbulent times are a way to see ourselves finding understanding under the most hopeful light. The name Sujo comes from a Mongolian legend that Fernanda read as a child, a story of friendship between a boy and a horse. So as is usual with us, the project was born of an encounter of ideas, memories, and things we love.

All of it led us to Sujo, a story of an orphan growing up in a Mexico stricken by drug violence, poverty, and high hopes, a tale of a young man fighting against repetition and finding his real self.
